Mr. Balfour, instead of following the pessimistic line of "The Morning Post," warmly advocated a treaty of absolute arbitration with America, holding that om wanted it. He answered with subtlety the objection of that paper that pledges are valueless by showing that the laws of civilized warfare are not violated and that arbitration treaties will be equally effective in the maintenance of peace when public opinion is behind them.

After Mr. Balfour's eloquent peroraposed treaty as the beginning of a new era there came a series of short addresses from the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, Chief Rabbi the Rev. F. B. Meyer and the Premier of New Zealand, and the audience retired with the consciousness of having taken part in a
